(1957) Further thoughts on babies as persons. aspect of mother love involves honoring the mother's subjectivity and validates her personhood, and as such it opens up the possibility of redefining mother love in terms that are empowering to mothers. Cultural ideologies of motherhood in the Western tradition prescribe not only certain behaviors that are seen as appropriate and desirable for practicing good mothering. However, the study of maternal ambivalence in relation to mother love still appears marginal to mainstream discussions of motherhood and is still often constructed in the context of pathology rather than healthy mother-child. Ability for mothering, but are denied the power to define and determine their own experiences of mothering. In the case of most traditional religious and political ideals
