Reading through the letters of Saint Paul it is clear that he is a master on using metaphors. Actually, one of his main ways to communicate ...
Paul's letters were written in order to persuade his audience of the powerful truth of the gospel that he learned from Christ himself. As such Paul is called to preach the crucified Christ in various sets of circumstances and in its many ramifications. Any reader of his letters is delighted by the many images he uses to transmit his message, which are very helpful for the reader to be close of Paul himself.

1. Usage of metaphorical speech by the first Christians. Marriage, which is essential to God's plan of happiness, was instituted among our first parents, Adam and Eve, even before the Fall. [1] In every dispensation since, prophets bearing the holy priesthood have taught God's eternal plan and have been witnesses to the central nature of marriage and the family in that plan. One of those prophets was Paul. During his ministry in the meridian of times, Paul encountered a Church membership that was changing with the influx of Gentile converts. Paul's letter to the Ephesians was divided into two parts: the first three chapters addressed doctrinal issues while the rest dealt with the practical matters. Just like in other epistles, he had to address the issue of legalism and reiterated that Christ had died to set them free. He ended the epistle with reminders on how to live properly and how to deal with other people. Philemon.

The University of Chicago Press Books. Jews and Gentiles. Especially in the protestant tradition-and particularly among Lutherans-it is Paul's Epistle to the Romans which holds a position of honor, supplying patterns of thought that are lifted into position of overarching and organizing principles for the Pauline material.Â But once the individual letters were acknowledged as Scripture they quickly suffered homogenization. In the last section of this essay we shall have reason to reflect further on the value of keeping these letters distinct, at least for the purpose of making sure what questions the Apostle intended to answer. Even the divinely right answer is not heard aright if it is applied to the wrong question. In what follows I have taken the risk of coining some slogan-like titles by which I hope to unmask Paul's original intentions.
