Much more than a trifle of truth is embodied in a simile drawn at the expense of many research workers who prop their argument with statistical proof. Likened to inebriated gentlemen affectionately clinging to lamp-posts, they are said to regard statistics as a source of support rather than as a center of illumination. One need not emphasize here the all too frequent appropriateness of the criticism. Rather, one is concerned with the frank admission of the critic that statistics do form a source of illumination for those whose wits are not dulled by number.
