The A&E department is the "shop window" of acute hospitals. It is the part of the hospital most closely in contact with the public as it offers the most informal access.¹ It plays the most important part in caring for the acutely ill and injured patients. Also it is surrounded by so much drama, tragedy, and media interest. The original term (casualty) meant a seriously injured patient. It was predominantly a military word, a general term for the accidents of service: after a battle the dead, the wounded, and the sick lumped together as "casualties". However, many were still resistant to any changes in the pattern of department staffing, believing that "casualty work" was not a specialty.^{44, 45} Nationally there was no fixed strategy for staffing.
