Religion is the opium of the people—this dictum by Marx is the corner-stone of the whole Marxist outlook on religion.[1] Marxism has always regarded all modern religions and churches, and each and every religious organisation, as instruments of bourgeois reaction that serve to defend exploitation and to befuddle the working class. At the same time Engels frequently condemned the efforts of people who desired to be “more left” or “more revolutionary”

than the Social-Democrats, to introduce into the programme of the workers' party an explicit proclamation of atheism, in the sense of declaring wa Using religion as a case of group belonging, the article proposes that party behaviour affects the very nature of the association between religion and party preference. Combining data on 50 parties with survey data on more than 11,000 citizens from 13 West European countries, the article provides strong empirical evidence of this proposition. Party and Religion are synonymous, and they have mutual synonyms. As much as Big Brother and the Party had replaced God and religion in Nineteen Eighty-Four, the Thought Police would count as this trope, similar to the Telegrammaton Clerics in Equilibrium. Continue reading the main story. The Tea Party movement clearly played a role in rejuvenating the Republican Party in 2010, helping the GOP take control of the House and make gains in the Senate. Tea Party supporters made up 41% of the electorate on Nov. 2, and 86% of them voted for Republican House candidates, according to exit polls. But the precise nature of the Tea Party has been less clear. Is it solely a movement to reduce the size of government and cut taxes, as its name "some people refer to it as the Taxed Enough Already party" implies? Or do its supporters share a broader set of conservative positions on social as... Conservative on Social Issues, Too. Influence of Religion. Strong Support from Evangelicals.
