It is believed that the combination of these factors have made China's economy in a high growth rate. In the unique social structure of China, politics always plays a leading role to economy. Economic development will inevitably require the change of the political system. Otherwise, politics cannot promote the economic development, but resistance to economic reform. China government already has begun the construction of "innovative country", and the conclusions shows that the economic growth of China should be rely on human capital and technological improvement as the main driving force to achieve the sustainability of economic growth. At last, technological improvement is the key factor in the continued growth of China economy. 4.0 Conclusion.

In Naughton's opinion, China cannot be considered a socialist country until it makes much greater progress fulfilling its own declared policy objectives of universal social security, modest income redistribution, and amelioration of environmental problems. References.
