Eskimo was not the first dramatic film to use an all-native cast for the native roles; that was the 1914 silent film In the Land of the Head Hunters.<sup>[36]</sup> It was, however, the first motion picture to be filmed in the language of a Native American people,<sup>[37]</sup> and the first feature film shot in Alaska.<sup>[30]</sup> Ray Mala became nationally famous. Freeze Frame: Alaska Eskimos in the Movies. Seattle, Wa.: University of Washington Press. Association, Alaska History Society (Alaska History award 1988). Freeze Frame takes a penetrating, often humorous, look at how Eskimos have been portrayed in nearly a century of film, from the pioneering documentaries of missionaries and Arctic explorers to Eskimo Pie commercials of the 1990s. Some of these works are serious attempts to depict a culture; others are unabashed entertainment, featuring papier-maché igloos and zebra-skin parkas. Even filmmakers who sought authenticity were likely to build igloos in villages that had never seen one and to hire non-Native actors to portray the Eskimo principals. The groundbreaking film Nanook of the North, released in Alaska and starring Alaska's first movie star, the film won the first Oscar for best film editing. But it had virtually disappeared -- until now. The Eskimo kissing in the movie is rooted somewhat in fact, she said. Nuzzling a nose against a neck or face was a sign of affection usually shown to children. Hollywood turned it into a romantic nose rub, said Fienup-Riordan, author of "Freeze Frame: Alaska Eskimos in the Movies." The wife-sharing had some truth too. It happened on rare occasions in Inupiaq culture, and in the Yup'ik culture of Southwest Alaska that Fienup-Riordan specializes in, she said. "It's Hollywood. There's some truth and some fabrication, but it's fun because it's well done,"
