In 1979, when I was preparing a paper on contemporary Chinese women's poetry to be presented at the international Conference on Women and Literature in China, I became aware that too little is known about women's poetry in China, especially in the modern period. I decided then to compile an anthology of this much-neglected body of work. The one anthology of Chinese women's poetry available to Western readers, Women Poets of China, translated by Zhong Ling and Kenneth Rexroth, was published in 1972, more than three decades ago. It concentrates overwhelmingly on traditional, pre-twentieth-century women poets. Modern critical analysis of nineteenth-century women's literature seeks, in part, to understand the underlying reasons that women authors, especially in America, Britain, and France, were able to gain such widespread exposure and prominence in an age known for its patriarchal and often dismissive attitude toward the intellectual abilities of women. Women's access to higher education increased exponentially during the century, providing them with skills that they could use to develop their art. The growth of market economies, cities, and life expectancies changed how women in Europe and the United States were expected to conform to new societal pressures, and made many women more conscious of their imposed social, legal, and political inequality.
